(Architettura e governo delle città Sara Protasoni,1998 This issue investigates the changing role of the public engineering offices in modern European cities. Today the design/construction/management of works that determine the morphology and appearance of towns is part of a complex process of production. Local government increasingly has the job of mere coordination of scattered technical functions, thus losing global control over the town's shape. At the end of the 19th century, large municipalities could promote and implement directly the transformation of entire areas of towns, modifying both structure and appearance. By presenting several case studies European cities and towns between 1918 and the reconstruction, this issue will focus on the changed and still changing role of public engineering offices in determining the morphology of towns and in governing and affecting their transformations.
